

Benchmarks

Doug Collins's third article for Anthropoetics is taken from his current research on the anthropological background of modern French thought. The three other contributors to this issue are all new to our journal. Dawn Perlmutter's essay is based on her intensive research into the underground sacrificial side of contemporary culture. Raymond Swing's is a sympathetic view of Generative Anthropology from a biological systems-theory perspective. Gabor Varga's article is part of a broad research project on the difference between oral and written ways of thinking that has interesting affinities with GA's ideas on language origin.

About our Contributors

Douglas Collins (dcollins@u.washington.edu), a member of the Anthropoetics editorial board, teaches French and Comparative Literature at the University of Washington. He is the author of Sartre as Biographer, as well as articles on nineteenth and twentieth-century French literature.

Dawn Perlmutter (idolchats@aol.com) is Assistant Professor of Art and Philosophy at Cheyney University of Pennsylvania, where she teaches ethics, aesthetics, cultural studies and alternative religions. Her research has been presented at numerous conferences and law enforcement agencies. She is the author of Patterns of Culture: Cult/Occult Law Enforcement Manual, co-editor of Reclaiming the Spiritual in Art and numerous articles. Currently she is completing a book entitled Postmodern Idolatry, Ritual Uses of Blood in American Culture. She holds a PhD from New York University and a MFA from The American University, Washington, D.C.

Raymond Swing studied music at the conservatory in Aalborg, Denmark and theory and history at the Humboldt University in Berlin, DDR. He taught in Denmark as a schoolteacher for thirty years. Since retiring in 1987, he has devoted his energies to his interdisciplinary interests in philosophy and dialectics (Marx), physics, biology, economics, history, culture, and the philosophy of science. He is a contributor to the Europäische Enzyklopädie zu Philosophie und Wissenschaften. His papers in German and English are available at <http://www.cirip.mobilixnet.dk/dialectics.html>.

Gabor Varga (sgvarga@osiris.elte.hu) holds an MA degree in history from the University of Budapest (ELTE). He is currently working on a doctoral dissertation on the emergence of European logical thinking.